

Journal Articles for Discussion and Evaluation: Your Guide to Excellence in Academic Research

In general, the composition of the work has many things to pick on. First of all, the tree trunks are rather close to the bottom of the canvas. Moreover, there is too much space for the sky, thus, the work is lowered. In addition, in spite of four palms, depicted on the canvas, the desert still seems to be empty, creating a feeling of solitude. Still, in spite of the mentioned compositional mistakes, it is hard to tear the eyes away from it. Another formal element that influences the mood of the viewer is the combination of parallels, horizontals (desert, sky, suburbs) and verticals (four palm trees). The presence of these patterns, that underline steadiness and lack of movement, only contributes to the strange feeling of loneliness.

Robert Bechtle creates a symmetrical balance in his work, leaving right and left sides of the canvas approximately the same in size. The artist applies the perspective in his work, decreasing the size of palm trees that stand farther. In this way, the trees do not stay in row. Still, all the palms have a photographic accuracy, avoiding blurred and unclear strokes. The repetition of the visual elements is represented by the one of the mentioned trees, that together with the sky and desert create an impression of infinity.

The color spectrum of the work ranges dramatically. The use of bright yellow and blue colors on the background together with dark green and brown tints of the trees is more than just appropriate. The green tops of palms highly contrast with the environment surrounding them. The suburbs on the background also stand out despite its remoteness to the foreground scene. The sky over the desert is saturated with the hues of different colors, starting with cold blue and ending with warm orange, creating a picture of Californian marvelous sunset. Speaking about the textures used in the work, it is already mentioned that the artist pays attention to all the details that is one of the major characteristics of photorealism.
